Thoughtful readers at times seek to put the idea of a paragraph into a topic of a few words and write this on the margin. The gains of a chapter are written out at the end. The inside back cover is sometimes used as a place for notes on what is read, what to go back to, and so on. The resolution to mark carefully makes one read with added attention. Summarizing requires concentration. The whole process, though it slows up progress, adds much to one s interest in a book. To reopen a marked book is like meeting an old friend. 3. Take Notes This requires reading at a table, with an armed chair, or at least with pencil and paper handy. Some men carry 3 x 5 paper in a small pocket book and make notes upon it...
