It was twinkling with appreciation of a fellow-man s enslavement. Ranata saw in the twinkle approval of her manoeuvres in a great cause, and responded to the new chord of sympathy with all a woman s facile manufacture of subtle understandings with unconscious man. I feel somewhat of a Jesuit, she said to him as they left the building. But it is success or failure, and I shall not fail. Your tactics are those of the man who wins. And I suppose you reason that men will fall in love with you anyhow--that one more or less doesn t matter. That is an idea! said Ranata. xvi After luncheon the two girls, by Alexandra s manoeuvring, were alone in Ranata s sitting-room. It was a very beautiful room now, with its golden walls, its rich Oriental hangings and chairs. The windows were open, and the Hungarian sunshine flooded it. Ranata sat in one of the deep straight-back chairs so beloved of royalty, Alexandra in a rocking-chair which had been upholstered to match the rest of the furniture, yet was impertinent and incongruous. There is only one thing that will reconcile me to parting with you when you marry, the Archduchess had remarked when it arrived; I can have a bonfire made of all those ridiculous chairs. And Alexandra had replied, I will convert you even to those before I die. To-day neither was sensible of pleasantries. Alexandra s...
